I've seen more families looking at their phones when they are eating. I'm not the only one. A restaurant has also noticed the problem and decided to give free kids' meals if parents quit using their smartphones when they eat there. Some people think the restaurant do this because it wants to become famous; others say they won't give up their smartphones for any reason.

As a mother, I try to take care of both my work and my children. I know I'm on my smartphone a lot. Often, it's for a good reason, but still, no one likes to be less important than the phone. Last Saturday, I took my daughter out to dinner. As we talked, I noticed two parents with their two children. The children focused on their smartphone games only, and their parents were also tapping on their smartphones. There was no conversation at all!

Conversation plays an important role in parenting. My children are still young, but they are starting to be more interested in the world around them. I will ask my children more questions. If I don't, I'll never learn about their thoughts and their lives.

In a word, I like the restaurant's great idea. I think parents should quit their phones and enjoy conversations with their children instead.

For some people, the worst part of being in a new place may be trying hard to get along with other people and making new friends. Here are some useful tips for you.

Most of the time, we feel nervous when meeting new friends. It is very likely that we show our feelings on our faces without knowing it. We should try to show our best side. Smile and the whole world smiles with you. If you smile, people can't help but feel happy around you.

It is also important to have self-confidence for making new friends. Remember to wear clothes that both show the real you and make you feel comfortable. When you feel comfortable, you are less likely to get too nervous to say anything wrong. Just be yourself—in your favorite clothes.

If you have trouble talking with people you have just met, try asking them some questions about themselves instead of talking about yourself all the time. People usually enjoy talking about themselves. For example, you can try asking the boy next to you what his interest is. You can also try asking the girl behind you who is her favorite singer.

It may take some time for friendship to form. Just enjoy the whole experience of making new friends.
